

Landscape Architecture

Spaces around buildings provide the social and physical setting for the broader community and environment. Our understanding of these spaces and the connection between natural systems and human activities forms the basis of our philosophy in landscape architecture. We are committed to this philosophy whether we are working on an independent landscape commission or working with one of our urban design or architectural teams.

At Hames Sharley, we approach design exterior works in the built or natural environment by:

- Firstly addressing the clients and user requirements to create a cohesive setting
- Addressing environmental and pragmatic issues
- Ensuring the design addresses aesthetic and cultural values with appropriate expression

Much pride is placed in producing designs that require power and visual excitement as with designs that are elegantly understated and refined. On every project, a design is produced that satisfies our clients, works with the context and is practical to implement.

Our landscape architects are involved in a wide range of project types ranging from designing the external spaces on an architectural project through to the design of public parks, town squares, and city boulevards. On our multidisciplinary projects they take a prominent design role from the start to ensure that buildings and external spaces work well together.
